CON'SCIENCE, (kon'shens,) n. [Fr., from L. conscientia, from conscio, to know, to be privy to; con and scio, to know; It. conscienza, or coscienza; Sp. conciencia.]

1. Internal or self-knowledge, or judgment of right and wrong; or the faculty, power, or principle within us, which decides on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of our own actions and affections, and instantly approves or condemns them.

Conscience is called, by some writers, the moral sense, and considered as an original faculty of our nature. Others question the propriety of considering conscience as a distinct faculty or principle. They consider it rather as the general principle of moral approbation or disapprobation, applied to one's own conduct and affections; alleging that our notions of right and wrong are not to be deduced from a single principle or faculty, but from various powers of the understanding and will. Encyc. Hutcheson. Reid. Edin. Encyc.

1. Agreement of the mind to what is proposed or stated by another; accord; hence, a yielding of the mind or will to that which is proposed; as, a parent gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter.

We generally use this word in cases where power, rights, and claims, are concerned. We give consent, when we yield that which we have a right to withhold; but we do not give consent to a mere opinion or abstract proposition. In this case, we give our assent. But assent is also used in conceding what we may withhold. We give our assent to the marriage of a daughter. Consequently, assent has a more extensive application than consent. But the distinction is not always observed. Consent often amounts to permission.

Defraud ye not one another, except with consent for a time. — 1 Cor. vii.

2. Accord of minds; agreement; unity of opinion.

All with one consent began to make excuse. — Luke xiv.

From union, order, full consent of things. Pope.

4. In the animal economy, an agreement, or sympathy, by which one affected part of the system affects some distant part. This consent is supposed to exist in, or be produced by, the nerves, and the affections to be communicated from one part to another by means of their ramifications and distributions through the body. Thus the stone in the bladder, by vellicating the fibers, will produce spasms and colic in the bowels; a shameful thing seen or heard will produce blushing in the cheeks. Quincy. Encyc.

But many facts indicate that other causes than nervous communication produce sympathy.

CON-SENT', v. i. [L. consentio. See the noun.]

1. Literally, to think with another. Hence, to agree or accord. More generally, to agree in mind and will; to yield to what one has the power, the right, or the disposition to withhold, or refuse to grant.

2. In logic, a proposition collected from the agreement of other previous propositions; the conclusion which results from reason or argument; inference; deduction.

3. Connection of cause and effect; consecution.

I felt
That I must after thee, with this my son;
Such fatal consequence unites us three. Milton.

4. Influence; tendency, as to effects. Note. — We have a peculiar use of this word, which may be a corruption for considered, or which may be a deviation from analogy by an insensible change in the structure of the phrase. "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature." As a participle, this word must here refer to us, or the sentence can not be resolved by any rule of English syntax. It would be correct to say, "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, the weakness of our nature being considered;" or, "We, considering the weakness of our nature, can not act otherwise." But the latter phrase is better grammar than it is sense. We use other participles in like manner; as, "Allowing for tare, the weight could not be more than a hundred pounds." These and similar phrases are anomalous. But considering is no more a kind of conjunction, in such a phrase, than it is a noun.

CON-SID'ER-ING-LY, adv. With consideration or deliberation. Whole Duty of Man.

CON'SO-NANCE, n. [Fr., from L. consonantia, consonans, from consono, to sound together; con and sono, to sound. See SOUND and TONE.]

1. Accord or agreement of sounds. In music, consonance is an accord of sounds, simultaneously produced, which creates an agreeable sensation in the ear as the third, fifth, and eighth. It denotes, also, the according intervals. When the interval of a consonance is invariable, it is called perfect; but when it may be either major or minor, it is termed imperfect. Busby.

CON'SO-NANT, n. A letter, or element of speech, having either no vocality, as p and the other mutes, or only an imperfect vocality, as b, l, &c. For this reason, consonants are ordinarily sounded only in connection with a vowel, and hence the name. The consonants are better called articulations, as they are the names given to the several closings or junctions of the organs of speech, which precede and follow the openings of the organs with which the vowels are uttered. These closings are perfect, and wholly intercept the voice, as in the syllables ek, ep, et, or imperfect, and admitting some slight sound, as in em, en. Hence, some articulations are called mutes, and others semi-vowels. The consonants begin or end syllables, and their use is to determine the manner of beginning or ending the vocal sounds. These closings or configurations of the organs, being various, serve to diversify the syllables, as in uttering ba, da, pa, or ab, ad, ap; and, although b and p may be considered as representing no sounds at all, yet they so modify the utterance of ab, ap, or ba, pa, that the slight difference between these articulations may be perceived as far as the human voice can be distinctly heard.

a count, and L. stabulum, a stable; L. comes stabuli, count of the stable.]

1. A high officer in the monarchical establishments of the middle ages. Brande.

The lord high constable of England was the seventh officer of the crown. He had the care of the common peace, in deeds of arms and matters of war, being a judge of the court of chivalry, now called the court of honor. To this officer, and to the earl marshal, belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blazonry within the realm. The power of this officer was so great, and so improperly used, that it was abridged by the 13th Richard II., and was afterward forfeited in the person of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, in 1521. It has never been granted to any person since that time, except pro hac vice, or on a particular occasion. Encyc.

2. An officer of the peace. In England, there are high constables, petty constables, and constables of London. The high constables are chosen at the court leets of the franchise or hundred over which they preside, or, in default of that, by the justices of the quarter sessions, and are removable by the same authority that appoints them. The petty constables are chosen by the jury of the court leet, or, if no court is held, they are appointed by two justices of the peace. In London, a constable is nominated in each precinct by the inhabitants, and confirmed at the court of wardmote. The duty of constables is to keep the peace, and for this purpose they are invested with the power of arresting and imprisoning, and of breaking open houses.

In the United States, constables are town or city officers of the peace, with powers similar to those possessed by the constables in Great Britain. A metal of a pale red color, tinged with yellow. It is found native in laminæ or fibers, in a gang almost always quartzous; it is also found crystallized, and in grains or superficial laminæ on stones or iron. It is not altered by water, but is tarnished by exposure to the air, and is at last covered with a green carbonated oxyd. Copper in sheets is much used for covering the bottoms of ships, for boilers, and other utensils; mixed with tin and zinc, it is used in enamel-painting, dyeing, &c.; mixed with tin, it forms bell-metal; with a smaller proportion, bronze; and with zinc, it forms brass, pinchbeck, &c. This application of face or countenance, which seems to be of high antiquity, proceeded probably from the practice of turning away the face to express anger, displeasure, and refusal — a practice still common, but probably universal among rude nations. Indeed, this is radically the same word as rough, L. raucus. The L. rugio is probably from the same root, and perhaps rugo. The Sax. cearcian, to creak, may be the same word, the letters transposed; as may the Sp. cruzir, to rustle, Gr. κρεκω, to comb, scrape, rake, and Russ. crik, a cry, krichu, to cry. On this word are formed shriek and screech.]

CRE-ATE', v. t. [Fr. creer; It. creare; Sp. and Port. criar; L. creo; Arm. croui; Corn. gurei. In W. crëu signifies to create, and creu, to cry, to crave, to caw, to beg. W. crete and crez, constitution, temper; also, a trembling or shivering with cold. Ir. croth or cruth, form, shape; cruthaighim, to create, to prove, assert, maintain. From the Celtic, then, it appears that the L. creo is contracted by the loss of a d or th. The Welsh has also cri, a cry, and criaw, to cry, both deduced by Owen from cre; but cre is a contraction of creou, to cry, or of gryd, a crying or whooping, or cryd, a shaking. In Welsh, also, cri signifies rough, raw, crude; all which unite in the root of cry, cradle, L. rudo, to bray. The primary sense of create and of cry is the same, to throw or drive out, to produce, to bring forth, precisely as in the Shemitic נזד. But the Welsh crëu and creu may, perhaps, be from different roots, both, however, with the same primary sense.]

or claim to confidence; the warrant on which belief, credit, or authority, is claimed, among strangers; as the letters of commendation and power given by a government to an embassador or envoy, which give him credit at a foreign court. So the power of working miracles given to the apostles may be considered as their credentials, authorizing them to propagate the gospel, and entitling them to credit.

CRED-I-BIL'I-TY, n. [Fr. credibilité, from L. credibilis.]

Credibleness; the quality or state of a thing which renders it possible to be believed, or which admits belief, on rational principles; the quality or state of a thing which involves no contradiction or absurdity. Credibility is less than certainty, and greater than possibility; indeed, it is less than probability, but is nearly allied to it. [See CREDIBLE.]

CRED'I-BLE, a. [L. credibilis.]

1. That may be believed; worthy of credit. A thing is credible, when it is known to be possible, or when it involves no contradiction or absurdity; it is more credible, when it is known to come within the ordinary laws or operations of nature. With regard to the divine Being and his operations, every thing is credible which is consistent with his perfections, and supported by evidence or unimpeachable testimony, for his power is unlimited. With regard to human affairs, we do not apply the word to things barely possible, but to things which come within the usual course of human conduct, and the general rules of evidence.

2. Worthy of belief; having a claim to credit; applied to persons. A credible person is one of known veracity and integrity, or whose veracity may be fairly deduced from circumstances. We believe the history of Aristides and Themistocles, on the authority of credible historians.

CRED'I-BLE-NESS, n. Credibility; worthiness of belief, just claim to credit. [See CREDIBILITY.]

CRED'I-BLY, adv. In a manner that deserves belief; with good authority to support belief.

CRED'IT, n. [Fr. credit; It. credito; Sp. id.; L. creditum. See CREED.]

1. Belief; faith; a reliance or resting of the mind on the truth of something said or done. We give credit to a man's declaration, when the mind rests on the truth of it, without doubt or suspicion, which is attended with wavering. We give credit to testimony or to a report, when we rely on its truth and certainty.

2. Reputation derived from the confidence of others; esteem; estimation; good opinion founded on a belief of a man's veracity, integrity, abilities, and virtue; as, a physician in high credit with his brethren. Hence,

3. Honor; reputation; estimation; applied to men or things. A man gains no credit by profaneness; and a poem may lose no credit by criticism. The credit of a man depends on his virtues; the credit of his writings, on their worth.

4. That which procures or is entitled to belief; testimony; authority derived from one's character, or from the confidence of others. We believe a story on the credit of the narrator. We believe in miracles on the credit of inspired men. We trust to the credit of an assertion made by a man of known veracity.

5. Influence derived from the reputation of veracity or integrity, or from the good opinion or confidence of others; interest; power derived from weight of character, from friendship, fidelity, or other cause. A minister may have great credit with a prince. He may employ his credit to good or evil purposes. A man uses his credit with a friend; a servant, with his master.

6. In commerce, trust; transfer of goods in confidence of future payment. When the merchant gives a credit, he sells his wares on an expressed or implied promise that the purchaser will pay for them at a future time. The seller believes in the solvability and probity of the purchaser, and delivers his goods on that belief or trust; or he delivers them on the credit or reputation of the purchaser. The purchaser takes what is sold, on credit. In like manner, money is loaned on the credit of the borrower.

7. The capacity of being trusted; or the reputation of solvency and probity which entitles a man to be trusted. A customer has good credit or no credit with a merchant.

8. In book-keeping, the side of an account in which payment is entered; opposed to debit. This article is carried to one's credit, and that to his debit. We speak of the credit side of an account.

9. Public credit; the confidence which men entertain in the ability and disposition of a nation, to make good its engagements with its creditors; or the estimation in which individuals hold the public promises of payment, whether such promises are expressed or implied. The term is also applied to the general credit of individuals in a nation; when merchants and others are wealthy, and punctual in fulfilling engagements; or when they transact business with honor and fidelity; or when transfers of property are made with ease for ready payment. So we speak of the credit of a bank, when general confidence is placed in its ability to redeem its notes; and the credit of a mercantile house rests on its supposed ability and probity, which induce men to trust to its engagements. When the public credit is questionable, it raises the premium on loans.

Cherish public credit. Washington.

10. The notes or bills which are issued by the public, or by corporations or individuals, which circulate on the confidence of men in the ability and disposition in those who issue them, to redeem them. They are sometimes called bills of credit.

11. The time given for payment for lands or goods sold on trust; as, a long credit, or a short credit.

12. A sum of money due to any person; any thing valuable standing on the creditor side of an account. A has a credit on the books of B. The credits are more than balanced by the debits.

[In this sense, the word has the plural number.]

CRIME, n. [L. crimen; Gr. κριμα; It. crime; Port. id.; Sp. crimen; Fr. crime; Arm. crim; Norm. crisme. This word is from the root of Gr. κρινω, L. cerno, to separate, to judge, to decree, to condemn. But this verb seems to be composed of two distinct roots; for, in Latin, the pret. is crevi, which can not be formed from cerno; and in Greek, the derivatives, κριθω, κριτις, κριτης, can not be regularly formed from κρινω. The Gr. κριμα is undoubtedly a contraction; for in Norman the word is crisme. The root, then, of these derivatives is the same as of the Ir. criathar, a sieve, W. rhidyll, Eng. riddle; W. rhidiaw, to secrete, to separate. We have screen, a riddle, from the root of κρινω, and riddle, from the Celtic root of κριτις, κριτης. To judge is to decide, to separate, or cut off, hence to condemn; a crime is that which is condemned.]

1. An act which violates a law, divine or human; an act which violates a rule of moral duty; an offense against the laws of right, prescribed by God or man, or against any rule of duty plainly implied in those laws. A crime may consist in omission or neglect, as well as in commission, or positive transgression. The commander of a fortress, who suffers the enemy to take possession by neglect, is as really criminal as one who voluntarily opens the gates without resistance.

But, in a more common or restricted sense, a crime denotes an offense, or violation of public law, of a deeper and more atrocious nature; a public wrong; or a violation of the commands of God, and the offenses against the laws made to preserve the public rights; as treason, murder, robbery, theft, arson, &c. The minor wrongs, committed against individuals or private rights, are denominated trespasses; and the minor wrongs against public rights are called misdemeanors. Crimes and misdemeanors are punishable by indictment, information, or public prosecution; trespasses or private injuries, at the suit of the individuals injured. But, in many cases, an act is considered both as a public offense and a trespass, and is punishable both by the public and the individual injured.

CRY, v. i.; pret. and pp. CRIED. It ought to be CRYED. [Fr. crier. The Welsh has cri, a cry, and rough, raw, criaw, to cry, clamor, or weep; and crevu, to cry, to crave; both deduced by Owen from cro, a combining cause, a principle, beginning, or first motion; also, what pervades or penetrates, a cry. This is the root of create, or from the same root. Cre, Owen deduces from rhe, with the prefix cy; and rhe, he renders a run or swift motion. This is certainly contracted from rhed, a race, the root of ride; Owen to the contrary notwithstanding. All the senses of these words unite in that of shooting forth, driving forward, or producing. There is a class of words a little different from the foregoing, which exactly give the sense of cry. It. gridare; Sp. and Port. gritar; Sax. grædan; Sw. grata; Dan. græder; D krytten; W. grydiaw, to utter a rough sound, from rhyd, the Welsh root of crydu, to shake or tremble, whence cradle. (W. creth, a trembling or shivering with cold, from cre; also, constitution, disposition.) The latter root, rhyd, crydu, would give cri, rough, raw, crude. Cry is a contracted word; but whether from the former or latter class of roots may be less obvious — possibly, all are from one source. If not, I think cry is from the French crier, and this from gridare, gritar.]

CUT, v. t.; pret. and pp. CUT. [Norm. cotu, cut. This word coincides in elements with the W. cat, a piece, cateia, to cut, cwta, short, cwtau, to shorten, and with ysgythru, to cut off, to lop, to shred, to carve, which Owen deduces from ysgwth, a push, from gwth, a push or thrust, gwthiaw, to push, thrust, press. Whether cut is derived to us from the Welsh or not, may be a question; but I have not found the word in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. It is obviously from a common root with the L. cædo and cudo, and the primary sense is, to thrust, to drive, to strike; and to cut off is primarily to strike off. We have proof of this in our own language; for a stroke with a whip is called a cut, and our common people, when they urge a person to ride or run with haste, cry out, Cut on, cut on. The fact is the same with many other words which now signify to separate with an edged tool. See Class Gd, No. 2, 4, 8, 43, 49, 56, 59, and, in a different dialect, Class Gs, No. 5, 6, 28, 32, 40, 41, 42, 67.]

But when an entire separation of the body is intended, it is usually followed by off, down, asunder, in two, in pieces, or other word denoting such severance. D.

D, in the English alphabet, is the fourth letter and the third articulation. It holds the same place in the English as in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, and Latin alphabets. In the Arabic, it is the eighth; in the Russian, the fifth; and in the Ethiopic, the nineteenth letter.

D is a dental articulation, formed by placing the end of the tongue against the gum just above the upper teeth. It is nearly allied to T, but is not so close a letter, or rather it does not interrupt the voice so suddenly as T, and in forming the articulation, there is a lingual and nasal sound, which has induced some writers to rank D among the lingual letters. It has but one sound, as in do, din, bad; and is never quiescent in English words, except in a rapid utterance of such words as handkerchief.

As a numeral, D represents five hundred, and when a dash or stroke is placed over it, thus, $\overline{D}$, it denotes five thousand.

As an abbreviation, D. stands for Doctor; as, M. D. Doctor of Medicine; D. T. Doctor of Theology, or S. T. D. Doctor of Sacred Theology; D. D. Doctor of Divinity, or dono dedit: D. D. D. dat, dicat, dedicat; and D. D. D. D. dignum Deo donum dedit.

Such are the Greek ὁ, ἡ, τὸ; the Latin hic, ille, ipse; the, this, and that, in English; le, la, les, in French; il, la, lo, in Italian. Thus, tree is an appellative or common noun; the tree, this tree, that tree, designate a particular tree, determinate or known. Homo signifies man; hic homo, ille homo, a particular man, &c. DE'MON, n [L. dæmon; Gr. δαιμων; Sp. It. demonio; Fr. demon; Ir. deamal, or deamon. The origin and primary sense of this word I have not been able to ascertain. Qu. Ar. دهم dahima, daima, to fall suddenly, to rush, to overwhelm, to obscure, to blacken; whence misfortune, black, blackness, evil, a monster. Or is it a compound of dea, dia, deus, and mon, a word signifying evil, from the Persian? I place little confidence in these conjectures.]

A spirit, or immaterial being, holding a middle place between men and the celestial deities of the pagans. The ancients believed that there were good and evil demons, which had influence over the minds of men, and that these beings carried on an intercourse between men and gods, conveying the addresses of men to the gods, and divine benefits to men. Hence demons became the objects of worship. It was supposed, also, that human spirits, after their departure from the body, became demons, and that the souls of virtuous men, if highly purified, were exalted from demons into gods. In the Scriptures, the Greek δαιμων is rendered devil, and sometimes, at least, improperly; for nothing is more certain than that different beings are intended by διαβολος and δαιμων. The demons of the New Testament were supposed to be spiritual beings which vexed and tormented men. And, in general, the word, in modern use, signifies an evil spirit or genius, which influences the conduct or directs the fortunes of mankind. [See Campbell's Dissert.]

DE'MON-ESS, n. A female demon. Mede.

["Dunce is said by Johnson to be a word of unknown etymology. Stanihurst explains it. The term Dans, from Scotus, 'so famous for his subtill quiddities,' he says, 'is so trivial and common in all schools, that whoso surpasseth others either in cavilling sophistrie, or subtill philosophie, is forthwith nicknamed a Duns.' This, he tells us in the margin, is the reason 'why schoolmen are called Dunses.' (Description of Ireland, p. 2.) The word easily passed into a term of scorn, just as a blockhead is called Solomon, a bully Hector, and as Moses is the vulgar name of contempt for a Jew." Dr. Southey's Omniana, vol. i. p. 5. *E. E.

E the second vowel and the fifth letter of the English alphabet, seems to be the ancient Phenician and Hebrew ע inverted, corresponding nearly with the Chaldaic and later Hebrew ה. Its long and natural sound in English coincides with the sound of i in the Italian and French languages, and is formed by a narrower opening of the glottis than that of a. It has a long sound, as in here, mere, me; a short sound, as in met, men; and the sound of a open or long, in there, prey, vein. As a final letter, it is generally quiescent; but it serves to lengthen the sound of the preceding vowel, or at least to indicate that the preceding vowel is to have its long sound, as in mane, cane, plume, which, without the final e, would be pronounced man, can, plum. After c and g, the final e serves to indicate that c is to be pronounced as s, and g as j. Thus, without the final e in mace, [mase,] this word would be pronounced mac, [mak,] and rage [rāj] would be pronounced rag. In a numerous class of words, — indeed in almost every word, except a few from the Greek, — the final e is silent, serving no purpose whatever, unless to show from what language we have received the words; and in many cases, it does not answer this purpose. In words ending in ive, as active; in ile, as futile; in ine, as in sanguine, examine; in ite, as in definite; e is, for the most part, silent. In some of these words, the use of e is borrowed from the French; in most or all cases, it is not authorized by the Latin originals; it is worse than useless, as it leads to a wrong pronunciation; and the retaining of it in such words is beyond measure absurd.

When two of this vowel occur together, the sound is the same as that of the single e long, as in deem, esteem, need; and it occurs often with a and i, as in mean, hear, siege, deceive, in which cases, when one vowel only has a sound, the combination I call a digraph, [double written.] In these combinations, the sound is usually that of e long, but sometimes the short sound of e, as in lĕad, a metal, rĕad, pret. of rēad, and sometimes the sound of a long, as in reign, feign, pronounced rane, fane. Irregularities of this kind are not reducible to rules.

As a numeral, E stands for 250. In the calendar, it is the fifth of the dominical letters. As an abbreviation, it stands for East, as in charts; E. N. E., east-north-east; E. S. E., east-south-east; E. by S., east by south.

With the Celtic corresponds the Russ. kajdei, each. I am inclined to believe both the English and Scottish words to be contractions of the Celtic ceach.]

ĒA'GLE, (ē'gl,) n. [Fr. aigle; Sp. aguila; It. aquila; L. aquila. Qu. from his beak, Ch. Heb כפי, to be crooked, (see Buxtorf,) or Pers. اجل.]

1. A rapacious bird of the genus Falco. The beak is crooked, and furnished with a cere at the base, and the tongue is cloven or bifid. There are several species, as the bald or white-headed eagle, the sea eagle or ossifrage, the golden eagle, &c.

The eagle is one of the largest species of birds, has a keen sight, and preys on small animals, fish, &c. He lives to a great age; and it is said that one died at Vienna, after a confinement of a hundred and four years. On account of the elevation and rapidity of his flight, and of his great strength, he is called the king of birds. Hence the figure of an eagle was made the standard of the Romans, and a spread eagle is a principal figure in the arms of the United States of America. Hence, also, in heraldry, it is one of the most noble bearings in armory.

These nodules often embrace at the center a kernel or nucleus, sometimes movable, and always differing from the exterior in color, density, and fracture. To these hollow nodules the ancients gave the name of eagle-stones, from an opinion that the eagle transported them to her nest to facilitate the laying of her eggs. Cleaveland.

EARTH, (erth,) n. [Sax. eard, eorth, yrth; D. aarde; G. erde; Sw. iord, jord; Dan. iord; Scot. erd, yerd, yerth; Turk. jerda; Tartaric, yirda. It coincides with the Heb. אֶרֶץ. The Ar. أَرْض aradh, from which the Arabic and Hebrew words corresponding to the Teutonic above, are derived, signifies to eat, gnaw, or corrode as a worm, or the teredo. It is obvious, then, that the primary sense of earth is fine particles, like mold. The verb may be from רָצַץ to break or bruise. The Ch. and Syr. אַרְעָא, earth, may be contracted from the same word. See CORRODE.]

1. Earth, in its primary sense, signifies the particles which compose the mass of the globe, but more particularly, the particles which form the fine mold on the surface of the globe; or it denotes any indefinite mass or portion of that matter. We throw up earth with a spade or plow; we fill a pit or ditch with earth; we form a rampart with earth. This substance being considered, by ancient philosophers, as simple, was called an element; and, in popular language, we still hear of the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water.

2. In chemistry, the term earth was, till lately, employed to denote a supposed simple elementary body or substance, defined to be tasteless, inodorous, uninflammable, and infusible. But it has also been applied to substances which have a very sensible alkaline taste, as lime. The primitive earths have been reckoned ten in number; of which five are considered earths proper, namely, alumina, glucina, yttria, zirconia, and thorina; four possess decided alkaline properties, namely, baryta, strontia, lime or calcia, and magnesia: and one, silica, is regarded as an acid, and often called silicic acid. Recent experiments prove that all of them, except silica, are compounds of oxygen with metallic bases.
Davy. Silliman. Phillips. Ure.

3. The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. The earth is nearly spherical, but a little flatted at the poles, and hence its figure is called an oblate spheroid. It is one of the primary planets, revolving round the sun in an orbit which is between those of Venus and Mars. It is nearly eight thousand miles in diameter, and twenty-five thousand miles in circumference. Its mean distance from the sun is about ninety-five millions of miles, and its annual revolution constitutes the year of 365 days, 5 hours, and nearly 49 minutes.

E-LEC-TRIC'I-TY, n. [from Gr. ηλεκτρον, amber.]

1. The subtile agent called the electric fluid, usually excited by the friction of glass. It was called electricity from the Greek word for amber, because it was in the friction of this substance that it was first observed. It is convenient to denominate it the electric fluid, although we know very little of its nature, because it has a greater resemblance to an elastic fluid of extreme rarity than to any thing else with which we are acquainted. Some bodies permit the electric fluid to pass freely through them, and are hence called conductors; others hardly permit it to pass through them at all, and are therefore called non-conductors. Metals are the best conductors; next, water and all moist substances; and next, the bodies of animals. Glass, resinous substances, (as amber, varnish, and sealing-wax,) air, silk, wool, cotton, hair, and feathers, are non-conductors. EL'E-GANCE, } n. [L. elegantia; Fr. elegance; It.
EL'E-GAN-CY, } eleganza; probably from L. eligo, to choose, though irregularly formed.]

In its primary sense, this word signifies that which is choice or select, as distinguished from what is common.

1. "The beauty of propriety, not of greatness," says Johnson.

Applied to manners or behavior, elegance is that fine polish, politeness, or grace, which is acquired by a genteel education, and an association with well-bred company.

Applied to language, elegance respects the manner of speaking or of writing. Elegance of speaking, is the propriety of diction and utterance, and the gracefulness of action or gesture; comprehending correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, delivered in an agreeable manner. Elegance of composition, consists in correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, or well-chosen words, arranged in a happy manner. Elegance implies neatness, purity, and correct, perspicuous arrangement, and is calculated to please a delicate taste, rather than to excite admiration or strong feeling. Elegance is applied also to form. Elegance, in architecture, consists in the due symmetry and distribution of the parts of an edifice, or in regular proportions and arrangement. And, in a similar sense, the word is applied to the person or human body. It is applied also to penmanship, denoting that form of letters which is most agreeable to the eye. In short, in a looser sense, it is applied to many works of art or nature remarkable for their beauty; as, elegance of dress, or furniture.

2. That which pleases by its nicety, symmetry, purity, or beauty. In this sense it has a plural; as, the nicer elegancies of art. Spectator.

4. Symmetrical; regular; well-formed in its parts, proportions, and distribution; as, an elegant structure.

5. Nice; sensible to beauty; discriminating beauty from deformity or imperfection; as, an elegant taste.

[This is a loose application of the word; elegant being used for delicate.]

6. Beautiful in form and colors; pleasing; as, an elegant flower.

7. Rich; costly and ornamental; as, elegant furniture or equipage.

7. Element, in the singular, is sometimes used for the air. Shak.
